Appearance: Gurahn tends to smile more than most Klingons. He has gentle features and is openly friendly, allowing him to overcome the Klingon reputation for senseless violence. He dresses in civilian clothes and projects a capable but non-threatening image.

Background: Gurahn was a warp shuttle captain during the Four Years War. He was part of a weaker family line, so his only hope of advancement was through the VIP passengers that he transported within the Empire. All of that was ruined, however, when Admiral Kamato mounted a failed coup against the Emperor. All of the VIP passengers were loyal to Kamato, along with most of Gurahn's crew.

Gurahn managed to enter a custom emergency code from the captain's chair to lock the bridge consoles and activate a Red Alert before fighting his way off the bridge. (No one expected one person to take on more than twenty mutineers, so the first two stabs were free.) The Security Office can monitor the entire ship, so he made his way there and locked himself in. Fortunately, the ship's engineer had locked himself in the Transporter Room and had already transported two bodyguards into space.

Gurahn quickly used the intercom to help his officer identify the right people to get rid of. It wasn't easy to get a lock inside the ship, but it really only takes a few successes to ruin morale. Several members of VIP staff were removed from the ship, and one of Admiral Kamato's oldest friends was transported from the captain's chair on the bridge. After that, everyone surrendered.

Gurahn tried to report back, but the mutineers had already sent messages to the Empire declaring their loyalty to Kamato. Everyone on the ship was politically burned whether they were part of the coup or not. Kamato left for the Triangle to form the Imperial Klingon States, but Gurahn couldn't join them because he had killed a bunch of Kamato's friends. With nothing left to lose, he executed the prisoners and took his remaining crew to the Triangle to start a new career as an independent trader.

Personality: Gurahn just wants to keep flying. He couldn't get anywhere in the Klingon Empire, but maybe he can make something of himself in the Triangle. He'll practice his own version of the komerex zha. It's his own ship and his own trading business that will grow, and his own crew will share glory under the naked stars. Every person onboard failed to fit into their own culture, so Gurahn will help them build a new one where they'll fit just fine.

Quotes: Today is a good day to escape!

Powers/Tactics: Guhran would rather talk his way out of a conflict, because that's cheaper than breaking a bunch of things that will need to be replaced. Failing that, it's best to talk while holding a disruptor. Failing that, someone might need to get shot. And failing that, someone might need to get stabbed. But talking is better, and staying alive is best.

Campaign Use/Notes: Guhran will show up because of some scam he's running to make money. It might even be a legitimate cargo run. He'll deal fairly because that's good for business, but he's not above taking an illegal contract if he think's it's worth it.
